"His lectures on history would compose, were they given to the public, a most valuable treatise." - Edward Gibbon.

"These lectures were left on the decease of Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell), in an imperfect state, with a strict injunction against their publication. One lecture, in particular, containing a more general view of society, struck me as a master-piece of composition, and as an example of English prose, peculiar indeed, and characteristic of the writer; but in purity, terseness, and a kind of sententious vigour, rarely equalled, and perhaps not surpassed, in the whole range of our literature." - H.H. Milman.
